Later, he added: "It's real hard for most people. I'm sure people [at the town hall] were in a real good place when I left." Cohen's office on Wednesday announced that the librarian "was dismissed for a period of time" during the investigation, but the financial details are confidential. The statement also says that Cohen "works to support the library's mission and in order to comply with the confidentiality requirements of the government's investigation." What about the $20,000 check? Here's where things get a bit fuzzy. It seems that Cohen, who is a wealthy man, did get a $20,000 check from the federal government. He says it was for legal bills he incurred while he was representing Stormy Daniels, an adult film actress who claims she had an affair with Trump. But a check is a check, and the money can't be used to buy a new car or a pair of shoes — it must be deposited to a bank account to be used. New Yorker magazine: 'The People Who Can't Afford Help Aren't Looking for Help' New Yorker magazine says that the money was paid to Cohen as part of a nondisclosure agreement and that the check wasn't necessarily written in exchange for his work on Stormy Daniels. "It's called a reimbursement payment, or a retainer," New Yorker executive editor Leon Wieseltier told NPR's Steve Inskeep. "It's something that you would do to somebody who's representing you, just to hire their legal counsel, who does not charge you for their services." There is no IRS requirement that such payments be disclosed to the IRS, the magazine said. The money came in the form of an $18,750 monthly retainer and a one-time payment of $20,000. If Cohen had not been paid, that would have represented the remainder of the $100,000 payment. "The People Who Can't Afford Help Aren't Looking for Help" The New Yorker piece focuses on the Trump administration's lack of support for low-income Americans, particularly those who 82157476af
